TURN OVER

Emily's first crime was a small one caused by snow.

Roots tripped her; her boots plunged into snowdrifts. Tiny avalanches cascaded coldly onto her hat, face and shoulders. Little by little, she squeezed herself through the gap in the thick hedge, the snow-covered flakes scraping against her coat. Snowflakes landed on her eyelids and made her blink. Behind her, her sledge caught against something. She yanked viciously at the cord and felt it bump itself free.

With another step she was standing in the castle grounds, her heart beating fast, her eyes peeled for danger. So far, so good. There was no one in sight.

She was up to her knees in a low snowdrift that had built up inside the hedge. Away to the right, a straggling flock of birds flew in the grey sky above the wood, while the far hedge was like a pencil line drawn unevenly against the whiteness. All the small dips of Castle Field had been smoothed away by the snow, but a deep shadow beyond marked the great curve of the moat ditch.

A few patches of broken wall leant out unevenly from the moat's raised upper edge. In the background the body of the castle itself rose like a black slab.

Turning, Emily hauled on the cord. Abruptly the sledge jerked into view, only to jam again behind the final mess of stems and tangled thorn. She bent down and pulled the yellow plastic, twisting it so that it came clear. Then she guided it out of the hedge and let it fall onto the snow drift.

She listened. Echoing laughter came from the direction of the moat, muffled by distance and the blanketing snow. Good, others were trespassing too and no one had come to catch them. It was going to be all right.

She set off across the field, each stride flaking her legs with white. The cold prickled through her jeans. Later it might become damp and uncomfortable, but now it invigorated her.

Every step helped freeze away the indoor stuffiness of the last few days.

She went down into a slight dip. Now she could no longer see the castle, just part of the outer wall, grey, crested with ice. The sky was heavy with the next snow. Her breath rose in big bursts of cloud.
